POTATO CREEK STATE PARK

Darcy Worster and fellow conservation club members first proposed a man-made reservoir on Potato Creek in the late 1930's. Their project was halted by WW II. Darcy Worster kept that dream alive by sending his hand-crafted insects to state officials to “bug” them about creating a park. His efforts succeeded when the area was designated to become a park in 1969.

Potato Creek became a reality on June 6, 1977 when the six square mile (3,840 acres) area was formally dedicated . The Park's 327 acre Worster Lake is named in Darcy's honor.

Native Americans collected plants with potato-like roots growing along the Creek. The early settlers' English translation was “wild potato”, hence the name “Potato” Creek. The Park is located 3 miles east of North Liberty on State Road 4.

In addition to the many recreational facilities that Potato Creek has to offer, visitors will find a variety of natural areas. Most of these were drastically altered by decades of farming and other land uses prior to the area becoming a park.

In the early 1990's an active resource management program was begun at Potato Creek. These efforts will restore and maintain some of the park's natural areas to conditions found here before the area was settled in the early 1800's.

The natural wetlands had been drained to farm the land over the last 100 years. Several of these are being restored to provide valuable habitat for a variety of plants and wildlife. The wetland types include saturated soil sedge meadows; shallow marshes; swamps and beaver ponds. Today more than a square mile of the park is covered by wetlands and Worster Lake. These areas abound in wildlife, especially during the spring and fall bird migrations.

Native prairie is also being returned to the Potato Creek landscape through plantings. The prairie areas will be maintained by periodic burning under very controlled situations. These meadows put on a colorful late summer flower and grass display.

Other areas of the park are being allowed to grow into hardwood forests. Among the highlights of the forests are the spring wildflower displays and a variety of wildlife including songbirds, raccoon, fox, coyote and turkey.

Swamp Rose Nature Preserve, located in the northeast section, offers a look at the eutrophic process. This means that a lake has slowly, over hundreds of years, become a wetland. A scenic small stream originates in this wetland and flows into Worster Lake. The Nature Preserve also has several unusual plants and is a favored location for beaver.

This blend of wetlands, prairies and forests is what was recorded here before the first European settlers arrived here in the 1830's. These varied communities provide homes for a wide array of wildlife for today's park visitor and for future generations to enjoy.
